Arylamine N-acetyltransferase deficiency: metabolic and genetic studies in a Mexican population. Arylamine N-acetyltransferase deficiency (NAT1) is an autosomal recessive disorder that results in the accumulation of aromatic amines in the body. The prevalence of this condition varies significantly, as it depends on the racial characteristics and habits of the affected population. NAT1 activity was assayed in 119 biological samples from a population of healthy adults in Oaxaca, Mexico. Of these, 52 samples (43.6%) were deficient in NAT1 activity. These deficient individuals were further evaluated regarding their prevalence of health conditions that would indicate other heterozygous or hemizygous genetic defects. NAT1 activity among the deficient population was associated with the presence of pyridoxine-dependent epilepsy (PDE). The prevalence of PDE was almost 12 times higher in the deficient population than in the general healthy population from the same geographic area. NAT1 status was also associated with the presence of hirsutism, which was more prevalent among NAT1-deficient individuals. NAT1 deficiency can be used as a genetic screening test for the presence of hereditary PDE, particularly in populations with low NAT1 activity. The association between NAT1 deficiency and hirsutism might be useful for NAT1 carrier screening in specific populations such as premenopausal women.
